VOL. XVI. NO. 32

OLD DELFORD'S GHOST

"It is a cruel injustice, Hilda, that you should be so shamefully wronged out of what justly belongs to you. That old Delford left a will giving you this beautiful homestead, I am positive, and if he did not announce his intention in so many words, he hinted strongly to that effect. Only a week before he died he told me that you were well provided for, and we all knew that Reuben Delford was no man to raise false hopes."

"Yes, Edward, I too believe that dear old Uncle Reuben provided for me, or he would never have refused to permit me to earn my own living. When I broached the subject to him, he laughed and said he possessed enough to keep his little girl from starving. But what is to be done? No will has been found, and, of course, the entire estate goes to Simon Delford, his nephew."

"Yes, curse him!" cried Edward, angrily. "He could tell where the will is, if he chose. He had a deep motive in coming here when the old man lay so ill, pretending that he loved him so dearly, and taking the entire care of him, not even allowing you to enter the sick man's room. If the truth was known, I believe the old man entrusted the will to him, and the penurious scamp, upon examining it, found that the greater part had been left to you, and destroyed it. But, Hilda, darling, do not for a moment think that I love you one whit the less on this account, for heaven knows how dear you are to me," he said, drawing her to him and imprinting a kiss on the rosy lips; "but it distresses me greatly that you will be obliged to live in poverty, when by right you should revel in luxury."

"Do not distress yourself, Edward, for I am willing to face poverty so long as I have you with me, and you will find me a most economical wife, I assure you," said Hilda, trying to smile.

"Hilda, darling," said Edward, clasping her in his arms, "you are a dear little, unselfish soul; but I shall not allow this miserly wretch to defraud you."

Hilda looked up in surprise.

"What can you do, Edward?" she asked.

"I am not sure that my efforts will result advantageously, but I can try, at any rate," he answered with a smile. "I mean to resort to a little strategy. Sit down, Hilda, and I will give you a few orders which I wish you to strictly carry out. I cannot let you into the secret at present, as it might interfere with the success of my plans. Now, listen, dear," he continued.

"In three days Simon Delford and his wife are to take possession of Sunset Grange. He has engaged me as secretary, so I shall retain my position for the present. He may, through common decency allow you to remain for sometime, but it is likely that we will soon take measures to eject you from your old home. Should this be the case," laying a purse in her hand, "I have made provisions for you. Keep it, darling," he said, as she hesitated and drew back, "and when you recover what justly belongs to you the sum can be repaid. Simon knows nothing of our engagement, or that we are connected by ties stronger than those of ordinary friendship. I wish to have him remain in ignorance, else my plan will prove a failure. We must not allow him, by word or look, to learn of the tie that binds us. Should he see fit to turn you from your home, go straight to Bradford, and remain there until I come for you."

Three days passed, and Sunset Grange was under the control of new occupants. Simon Delford and his wife had taken indisputable possession of the lovely home which had been Hilda's since childhood.

Ten years before a fearful epidemic had visited the little village of Morton, and John Braithwaite, an honest, industrious carpenter, and his frail wife were prostrated by this fell disease, and had died within two days of each other, leaving the poor little orphan Hilda to the mercies of a cold world.

No one wanted the child, and the almshouse seemed the only refuge, when, to the surprise of the entire neighborhood, old Reuben Delford, a miser, who had hitherto evinced little or no feeling for his fellow beings, now stepped forward and announced his intention of adopting the little orphan as his own child.

No one had thought that Reuben Delford possessed a spark of human feeling, but it was evident that there still remained in his heart one little warm spot which had not been chilled by the love of mammon. And, although Hilda was but eight years old, she ruled both mansion and master with the wand of love.

And Reuben learned to set great store by the little orphan, manifesting a regard for her which no one had dreamed him capable of. He was kind and indulgent, humoring her in every whim and seemed never so happy as when the little arms were about his neck and the childish voice calling him "Dear Old Uncle Ruby."

What cared he what the neighbors said of him. Hilda loved him and right royally did she defend him, growing fiercer with anger when anyone dared to speak ill of him in her presence.

At first Simon Delford, his only living relative, in his smooth, silky way, tried to induce the old man to allow him to take the girl to his home, thinking that if he could get her away from Sunset Grange Reuben would soon forget her. He argued that, being only a child, she needed motherly care and his wife Samantha would be delighted to have a little girl around.

But Reuben thoroughly understood Simon's motive and declared it to his face, whereupon Simon flew into a passion, denouncing his uncle as a soft-hearted old fool.

The quarrel, however, was of short duration, for Simon was too farsighted to risk losing a fortune, even though it was not so large as he had hoped; so he returned to his uncle and made an abject apology, declaring that it deeply pained him to have trouble arise between his only living relative and himself.

Reuben had very little faith in Simon's repentance, as he knew him to be a cold, mercenary schemer, and inwardly vowed that he would get very little of his (Reuben's) wealth. Still, he allowed him to think himself fully forgiven, whereupon Simon returned home willing to await the development of events.

Simon came around occasionally always making great pretensions of affection for "Uncle Reuben's little girl," as he called Hilda. But Hilda had taken a great dislike to Simon, and made no effort to conceal it. And glad was she when each of his periodical visits came to an end.

At last old Reuben's eyesight failed him and being unable to attend to his business affairs he was obliged to employ a secretary in the person of one Edward Wieland, a handsome young man, whose poverty was his only drawback. He was not long in Sunset Grange when he took it into his head to fall madly in love with pretty Hilda Braithwaite, now a lovely girl of eighteen. That his love was returned were already aware; and so for a year all went merrily as a marriage bell.

But at the end of that time, and the day succeeding the one on which Simon had come to make a monthly visit, old Reuben was taken suddenly ill.

Hilda was greatly distressed and would have been happy to repay her kind old friend by loving care through his illness, but Simon emphatically declared that the sick room was not the place for a young girl like her and further more insisted that he himself, by request of his uncle, was to act as nurse.

Four days passed, and then Simon was seen emerging from the sick room with a handkerchief pressed to his eyes.

"Oh, Simon, he is worse!" cried Hilda, grasping his arm.

"My dearly beloved relative has gone to his eternal home, and I am left alone," said Simon in a sniveling tone.

"You are a wicked, cruel man, Simon Delford, not to allow me to see dear old Uncle Reuben, before he died," exclaimed Hilda, sinking into a chair, utterly overcome with grief.

Simon remained until after the funeral, when it was learned that no will had been found.

A well known lawyer in the neighborhood stated that he, at one time, had drawn up a will for Reuben Delford, but Simon declared that the old man had told him during his illness that he had destroyed it. Therefore the estate passed into the hands of his only living relatives, Simon Delford.

"We should be pleased to have you remain with us for a short time, Hilda, if you have not made other arrangements," said Simon, one afternoon, a few days after they had taken possession.

Hilda well knew that this was a polite way of letting her know that she must not expect to remain permanently at the Grange.

"I have not had time to make any arrangements in regard to a change of abode," she answered shortly, "but will endeavor not to burden you long with my presence."

One day, as Simon drove to the village some four miles distant, his horse evinced signs of lameness and he was forced to leave him in a neighboring stable. Being too penurious to hire another animal, Simon set out to walk.

It was late when he started for Sunset Grange, and the night being cloudy, the walk through the lonely country road was anything but pleasant.

Soon the rain began to fall in torrents, and as he entered a wood to make a short cut to his house he heard a sepulchral voice proclaim his name.

"Simon Delford! Simon Delford!" the voice exclaimed, "what do you do with my will?"

The question seemed to echo through the woods, and as Simon started in fright from tree to tree to discover the speaker, he saw standing before him a figure which in the gloom seemed the image of his dead uncle.

"Lord have mercy on me!" the terrified man exclaimed, as he dropped to the damp earth, and panted in horror while the ghastly figure stood over him, throwing upon him the light of a bull's-eye lantern.

"What did you do with my will?" the ghastly figure again asked.

"You—you—you'll find it on the northwest corner of the cellar wall, behind a loose stone," Simon answered with a pause after each syllable, as he struggled to control the rat-tat-tat of his chattering teeth.

The light of the lantern was promptly extinguished, and poor Simon was alone in the darkness.

The next day, when he went to the cellar to look for the will, in the spot where he had concealed it, was gone!

A week later the document was in the hands of a lawyer, who presented himself at Sunset Grange, with the necessary legal papers for the ejectment of Simon Delford, and established the claim of Hilda Braithwaite as Uncle Reuben's sole heiress.

"I played it on him nicely," said Edward Wieland, in a subsequent interview with Hilda, "and I could hardly keep from laughing as the frightened wretch lay at my feet, as pale as death."

In the following May a grand wedding was celebrated at the Grange, and Edward Wieland and Hilda Braithwaite were the principals.

To Be a Good Neighbor.

To be a really good neighbor demands the possession of many excellent qualities—tact, temper, discernment and consideration for other people's feelings; and, if we possess all, or some of these qualities, innumerable and never-ending are the benefits we may confer on each other, and a great deal of pleasure may be the result. But, because we are neighbors, we need not necessarily be close friends. We may be friendly enough to enjoy the pleasure of doing them little kindnesses and receiving the same in return. Being kindly disposed of to all by no means implies that our house is to be open from morning till night to visitors. The typically good-natured person, who is at every one's beck and call, is likely to be greatly imposed upon and to please no one really; one must be able to say "No," and to decline being made use of by every one.

"Prepare for the worst," but hope for the best," says the old proverb. Hope for health, but be prepared for colds, coughs, croup, bronchitis pneumonia, or any other throat or lung difficulty by having Ayer's Cherry Pectoral always at hand. It is prompt to act, sure to cure.

Household Hints.

EDITOR GRAPHIC—I will send a few suggestions, hoping they will be of benefit to some one.

If you will invert a saucer in the bottom of your kettle before putting in your dumplings to cook, it will prevent burning.

My sister took iron rust out of a white skirt by applying lemon juice and steaming over a kettle of boiling water. If the first application does not take out, try, try again.

When your dishes become yellowed with ashes; they will look bright and pretty. Also iron stains on glass can be scourged off with ashes.

If you get a nickel box of short, large-headed tacks and drive in the sole of your heavy shoes, it will make them last as long as the uppers.

We have made good potato custard with butter-milk, by putting in soda the last thing before pouring in pan; bake immediately to prevent soda making batter black.

I have just learned an easy way to make a cream pie:

Grease two pie tins thickly and sprinkle them with all the cornmeal that will cling to them, and a little more; then pour in very carefully the following mixture: Four heaping tablespoonsful of flour, one cup of sugar and a pinch of salt, stirring well; pour in radially three cups of cream; when smooth and creamy, add one teaspoonful of flavoring; set in hot-test part of oven and leave until cream is set. A few moments on the shelf of the oven will make them a delicate brown on top. Set aside to cool.

If you will put what ground coffee you aim to use for breakfast in a cup and pour cold water on it at night, and next morning pour it in your coffee-pot and pour boiling water on it and let stand for a few moments, it will be clearer; I think makes quicker.

In doing drawn work, baste your goods on colored paper. It will be easier on your eyes.

"Turn the rascals out!"—the familiar party cry—may be applied to microbes as well as to men. The germs of disease, that lurk in the blood are "turned out" by Ayer's Sarsaparilla as effectually as the old postmasters are displaced by a new administration.

The Only One To Stand the Test.

Rev. William Copp, whose father was a physician for over fifty years, in New Jersey, and who himself spent many years preparing for the practice of medicine, but subsequently entered the ministry of the S. E. Church, writes: "I am glad to testify that I have had analyzed all the sarsaparilla preparations known in the trade, but AYER'S is the only one of them that I could recommend as a blood-purifier. I have given away hundreds of bottles of it, as I consider it the safest as well as the best to be had."—WM. COPP, Pastor M. E. Church, Jackson, Minn.
